As part of the Counselor Education and Supervision (CES) identity, mentoring is key to developing emerging counselors. However, there is a lack of continuity and definition of what constitutes mentoring in counselor education. ~~This is understandable, as CES professionals are expected to develop proficiencies in areas other than mentoring.~~ The combination of these areas can create deficiencies in one area or another (including mentoring) due to a lack of time and information to continue developing aptitude. This presentation is designed to offer a clear definition of and practical design for continuity in CES programs. The presenters will offer current research in mentoring relationships and encourage effective ways to provide mentoring for all emerging counselors through CES programs.

Program Description (Please include rationale, program goals, and delivery method. All presentations, particularly those related to teaching or supervision client diagnosis, evaluation, or treatment, must provide evidence/research that the information presented is clinically sound and in accordance with accepted professional practice, ethical guidelines, and current research. A space for references is provided in the next question. Character Maximum: 3000

Effective mentoring practices in the counselor education and supervision field are necessary in order for students to thrive academically, professionally and personally. The purpose and goal of this program is to provide an understanding of effective mentoring practices in counselor education and how the mentoring practices are imperative to develop competent counselors-in-training. ~~It is also to understand what ineffective mentoring practices look like.~~ It also provides research guidelines and practices that can be used by mentors. The delivery method of the program is through PowerPoint presentations, trainings, and meetings dedicated to the mentoring aspect of students.

Effective mentoring is the process of creating psychological and academic safety in and out of the classroom setting for all students. The ACA and ACES have recognized mentoring through awards by highlighting the values and roles of a good mentor, which includes leadership abilities. An effective mentor also has a history of professional excellence and service to the profession (Walker, 2006). Mentoring CES students includes building rapport, while being supportive of the individual, regardless of race, ethnicity and disabilities. Mentors provide support to students and believe in the student's abilities (McWeeny, 2002); Schweibert, 2000). A good mentor will have an open mind, as it relates to the student's issues, while also providing positive feedback and corrective criticism. Great listening skills are needed, and a mentor should also be kind and caring.

According to research, effective mentoring includes the relational model (Walker, 2006), mutuality (Johnson, 2013), co-mentoring, and mentoring in ethics, culture and gender. (Walker, 2006). Mentors should understand the relational commonalities in mentoring relationships and how they are helpful (Walker, 2006). It includes the mentor recognizing the importance of responding to personal needs of the CES student, along with providing support for academic and career concerns. The CES student should know and understand that they have this support. In the process of mentoring, respecting the mentee's unique multicultural background and customizing the approach to fit the mentee's needs is urgent (Walker, 2006). One must also understand ineffective mentoring practices, which includes ignoring the mentee's needs/wants and not modeling leadership skills (Johnson, 2008). The mentor could ignore signs of academic and personal distress and failure. Also, being insensitive to race, culture, ethnicity, gender and disabilities would be ineffective (Johnson, 2008).

CES department heads and supervisors can take measures to ensure that their CES program has effective mentoring practices. They could facilitate mandatory training and seminars to further educate CES professors on effective mentoring practices, while integrating surveys and interviews of students (Purgason et al., 2018). Professors could learn techniques to effectively identify if there is a need for personal or academic support for mentees (Purgason et al., 2018).

Emerging counselors are expected to maintain certain dispositions throughout their education. CES professionals desire to and are required to assess these dispositions on a regular basis. However, finding time and space to observe these behaviors for assessment can be limited. This creates the need for a CES professional to form mentoring relationships outside the classroom to assess and prepare emerging counselors for their profession effectively. Additionally, emerging counselors typically need structured guidance on professional identity in ways that a traditional pedagogy cannot provide. CES professionals can partner with emerging counselors to provide this structure as they navigate the nuances of their professional identity. When one searches for definitions of mentoring and continuity in practical guidance on mentoring, one finds timely information that will enhance the ability to assess dispositions and create lasting organic relationships. This presentation will address the need for building partnerships with students. It will also help CES professionals understand the rationale for and pragmatic tools for implementation. CES professionals will be able to define mentoring, collaborate with other CES professionals and students on mentoring practices, and offer recommendations to program administrators for developing counselor identity through mentoring relationships in CES programs.

Please discuss the expertise of the presenters and explain why they are qualified to make the proposed presentation. Do not include any identifying details.
