

Our Christian institutions of higher education are becoming more diverse by the day. Many university leaders are diligently seeking the best ways to educate and care for people from these diverse cultural backgrounds. One area of concern is emotional regulation, which can contribute to student success if properly stewarded. This presentation seeks to gather the existing literature on the differences in cultural emotional experience, define and offer implications of a secure attachment to God, and propose recommendations for Christian College Campuses based on the blending of these two psychological and spiritual phenomena.

Recommendations:

1. Introduce Cognitive Reappraisal (reframing emotional experiences) in the core curriculum to allow students to grow in emotional awareness.
2. Connect Christian Meditation and Emotional Regulation through opportunities of spiritual integration, such as chapel or small group studies.
3. Offer problem-solving and healthy conflict training through mental health coaches in connection with Student Development offices.
