

VIDEO PRESENTATION: ORAL CASE PRESENTATION FOR GROUP SUPERVISION

Supervisees: (AC)

A. Personal data of supervisees

This group consists of both first and second-semester internship students from John Brown University's Graduate Counseling Degree Program. They are a mixed group of men and women of all ages, races, and backgrounds. The two presenters for the class I am presenting were first-semester internship students. They both happen to be female and in their 20s. They both see clients at one of our larger group private practice sites. This site is notorious for systemic work with couples integrating a biblical worldview. The students see clients at the site 1-2 days per week for a total of 8-10 clients per week.

B. Summary of group supervision history

This class meets on Monday from 3:00-5:30, where 2 students present a video for feedback each week. For this class period, my supervisor and lead instructor for the course walked u through the first presentation and handed it over to me for the second presentation after a break. This was the student's second video presentation. The video was of an individual session with a minor client whose parents are going through a divorce. The student decided to use narrative therapy for this session. The student reported her desire for feedback on the session's pace, the use of narrative therapy, and the session's directive nature.

After the student gave us a brief history of the sessions, the client's presenting issue, and her conceptualization of the case, we watched 10 minutes of the session. Once the session video was complete, I asked the student how she felt about watching it this time. Then, I opened the class for feedback on what the rest of the students saw. Each student was encouraging and helpful to the presenter. After some time, I asked the presenting student what she thought was good about the session. I then gave feedback on her questions about pacing, directiveness, and narrative therapy.

As we will not watch a video during this class time, I will note that the most anxiety-provoking part of the class for me was waiting for my time to lead the class. I wasn't sure the lead instructor wanted me to say anything before that, so I didn't. I think I could improve my leadership in future classes by being more relaxed and enjoying the time. However, I feel like my feedback was helpful and on target for the most part.

C. Solicit feedback from group

1. How do you correct challenging students in a group who give less than helpful feedback?
2. How much do you let students talk and engage versus how much you interject yourself?
3. What other formats have you found helpful?
